

Words that sound the same but have different meanings:

I'll meet you in the dairy aisle of the grocery store.

My fluffy, blue, bath towel is the same color as the tile on the bathroom wall.

The man who went through the turn-stile to get on the train was wearing an old style hat.

Walk in single file and pick up a nail file. Use it to file your fingernails.

In basketball when the referees call a foul, some fans get angry and yell at him, using foul language.

Chickens and turkeys are types of fowl.

Bile is made in the liver and is used to help break down fats when food goes into to our bowel.

Did you lie about spilling the bag of lye on the ground?

The worker will have to go on trial for stealing a trowel from the construction site. The trial will be quite a sight in the small village. Many villagers will walk for miles on the dusty trail just to get to the trial.

In the laboratory, the orange liquid in the glass vial had a vile odor.

The person who brings the mail is not always a male but we still call that person the mailman.

When I colored my hair with black dye it looked so terrible I wanted to die.

In the monastery, the old friar was afraid to use the deep fryer to fry chicken for the other friars.

Please make a list of the facts I will need and fax the list it to me. ("Fax" is short for "facsimile" fak SI mill ee)

Ben will earn enough money to buy his the large urn his mother wants to fill with flowers in her garden.

I could feel the rough nap of the blanket as I lay down for a nap. Then I put on my knapsack and hiked again.

The yew tree made shade for you and the female sheep, which is known as a ewe.